Artikel ini merupakan usaha awal untuk memperkenalkan konsep Nusantaranologi di Indonesia. Melalui survei bibliografi dan pengalaman penulis dalam pengembangan riset di negara ini, tampak bahwa Indonesia memiliki pijakan keilmuan yang amat kuat, jika dibandingkan dengan negara-negara lainnya. Kekayaan khasanah lokal di Nusantara dapat dijadikan sebagai langkah awal untuk membangun konsep keilmuan Nusantaranologi. Dalam studi ini, penulis melakukan survei bibliografi tentang bagaimana pengaruh ilmu sosial dan humaniora dari Barat terhadap berbagai riset di Indonesia. Penulis berargumen bahwa pengaruh tradisi ilmu dari Barat tampaknya harus dipertanyakan ulang di dalam memahami berbagai produk pengetahuan lokal di Nusantara. Penulis juga menemukan berbagai hasil riset dari peneliti lokal telah menunjukkan bahwa produk pengetahuan di Nusantara sangat mendalam, jika dibingkai dalam satu payung ilmu pengetahuan, yaitu Nusantaranologi. Akhirnya, kajian ini diharapkan dapat menjadi langkah awal bagi para peneliti di Indonesia untuk terus berupaya mengedepankan kajian-kajian lokal, sambil terus memperkuat dasar-dasar keilmuan secara filosofis, untuk memperteguh konsep Nusantaranologi atau Studi Indonesia.

Abstract

This study is the first attempt to introduce the concept of Nusantaranology in Indonesia. Based on a bibliographic survey and the authors' experiences in research development, it appears that Indonesia has a very strong scientific foundation compared to other countries. Besides, the fact that the wealth of local treasures in Nusantara can be utilized as a first step to develop the scientific concept of Nusantaranology. In this study, the authors conducted a bibliographic survey on how the influence of Western social sciences and humanities on several studies or research in Indonesia. The authors argue that the influence of the Western scientific tradition needs to be re-examined in understanding the various local knowledge found in Nusantara. The authors also found that various research results from local researchers have shown that the products of knowledge in Nusantara are very profound if they are framed under a scientific umbrella, i.e Nusantaranology. Finally, this study is expected to be the first step for researchers in Indonesia to carry out various studies on local issues, while continuing to strengthen the philosophical foundations of science, to reinforce the concept of Nusantaranology or Indonesian Studies.

Introduction

Recently, the authors have often been appointed as reviewers for research and scientific journals at several universities in Indonesia and the Ministry of Religious Affairs of the Republic of Indonesia. The authors were also invited as discussants in the proposal seminar and research results at the Center for the Conservation of Cultural Values (BPNB). These experiences have given us lots of experiences in the cultural studies that the authors have been working on so far. Therefore, the authors were given access to information about trends in social and humanities research in Indonesia. Especially when discussing 32 research papers from BPNB throughout Indonesia, which were presented in the seminar on Samosir Island on 23-26 April 2019. The authors reviewed nearly 200 research proposals from the State Islamic Higher Education (PTKIN) in the archipelago.

This experience gives the impression to the authors that cultural studies in Indonesia are many. Not a few researchers raised such unique local treasures. The researchers succeeded in describing the uniqueness of their locality to be used as the main material in their research. But these studies still stand on their own and are not dialogued within a scientific frame known as Nusantaranologi (the science of Nusantara/archipelago). Of course, this space needs to be filled in, so that the awakening of Nusantara science can explain every cultural phenomenon that exists in this country. This gap is what led the authors to compile a work that can be used as a philosophical basis for understanding the world of culture in Indonesia.

As long as being national reviewers, the authors found that the researchers were not able to link their research theme to what was happening in various regions in Nusantara. Their research is still separated and as if not found in other areas. Whereas, in the seminar, cultural studies in certain areas seemed to have similarities with other areas. Besides, the results of their research have not communicated with the world of social anthropology in a broad sense. The studies carried out still cannot be used as a national and international discourse. As a result, the research results are only used as library collection in the cupboard or warehouse in the offices. Research administration matters more than the distribution of research results.

The above conditions, of course, cannot be handed over to researchers alone. This is caused by the cultural knowledge of researchers who have not yet communicated the results of research with the scientific discourse that become the umbrella of the research carried out. In other words, researchers still have difficulty to enter research results at the scientific discourse level. Such a condition locks the communication of knowledge between Indonesian researchers and the world of research internationally. Thus, the very authentic results of the research are not communicated to researchers abroad.

This study will not discuss all of the problems above but seeks to reveal the direction of cultural studies in Indonesia. The authors have tried to explore cultural issues from the strategic aspect;¹ raise Indonesia's local treasures in a scientific frame in the book Acehnologi,² and linking cultural studies with the national imagination.³ The study of meta-theory and metaphysics of Nusantara science has been discussed in the Contribution of Charles Taylor, Syed Muhammad Naquib Al-Attas, and Henry Corbin in Metaphysics and Meta-Theory Studies on Nusantara Islam in Indonesia. This effort has been trying to link cultural studies with various issues in the world of science.⁴ However, after considering the experiences above, the authors took the initiative to write a specific study to explain the new map of cultural studies in Indonesia in realizing Nusantaranology studies. The purpose of mapping here is from a scientific aspect, which must be filled with a comprehensive explanation. This is where the main focus of this study that is to explore the aspects of the scientific foundation based on the scientific treasures found in Nusantara.

Contestation of Social Sciences and Humanities in Indonesia

So far, when conducting researches, researchers of social sciences and humanities often think imperfect if they do not refer to the theories from Western scholars. Most researchers usually cite Clifford Geertz's theory.⁵ Likewise, socio-cultural studies never come out of the baboon books written by Emile Durkheim and Max Weber.⁶ The mindset of Snouck Hurgronje has also dominated the study of cultures in Indonesia.⁷ Perhaps, the lecturers at well-known universities in Indonesia always refer to Western works, when teaching or guiding their students' research at university. This rigidity makes students, when doing research, will continue to refer to the theories learned by their lecturers during doctoral studies, or when writing works in their academic careers. This problem, when the authors reviewed the research results of Indonesian researchers, finally does not provide new space for them to be creative in theorizing the data found during the research. In other words, they might have rich data, but when juxtaposed with Western theories, their research results are poor.⁸

It is not wrong. Even in understanding social anthropological theories, researchers are often led to socio-humanities studies produced by Western researchers. The authors are not against such works. However, the more Western theories are used, the more scientific building will be strengthened there. For researchers who understand data through theories from the West, the results of their studies have become so tedious. The data are embedded in the Western scientific tradition, not embedded in the scientific tradition of Nusantara. This is the reality so far that the scientific tradition of Nusantara even establishes scientific buildings in other places. At the same time, some scholars from the West have started to introduce various scientifical concepts from local people.⁹ Even sharper, some of them challenged the tradition of learning in higher education in Indonesia.¹⁰

At the same time, several Indonesian writers began to develop research styles based on the ethnicities in Nusantara.¹¹ For example, Suwardi Endraswara in *Javanese Ethnology*¹² tries to open up the Javanese study methodologically from the perspective of ethnology studies. This book is very good at mapping important themes in Javanese research.¹³ Suwardi is a writer who has explored the spiritual world of Java.¹⁴ Besides, there is also another important study such as the one that was conducted by Jakob Sumardjo in understanding Sundanese culture. Here, Jakob enters

From these works, it seems that the writers want to independently build a frame of thought regarding cultural studies in Nusantara. If the works of writers, both in Nusantara and outside Nusantara, are related to each other, there would be scientific structures that can be a distinctive feature of cultural studies in Nusantara. Various data and cultural facts in Nusantara have been used as material for analysis by writers/researchers, without any attempt to construct a science of Nusantara. This is because the studies of Nusantara are often directed at regional studies, for example, the Southeast Asian Studies.¹⁸ Or, studies that are categorized as local knowledge are often attached to ethnicity studies that are easier to understand, so that they can connect with foreign researchers, such as Malay Studies. Thus, the uniqueness found in Nusantara is more likely to support studies that are already well known in socio-anthropological studies in Southeast Asia.¹⁹ Not only that, many think that the development of cultural studies, which was initially for the interest of colonialism, then turned into part of a state's development agenda. This condition then draws the agenda of cultural studies in the efforts to unite in the context of the nation-state.²⁰

Whereas in Nusantara, the wealth or mosaic of civilization exceeded theories in developmentalism and nationalism.²¹ The issues of ethnicity and nationalism that tend to be taken by cultural values,²² seem to leave the value aspects of the culture itself. A culture that can be embedded in the unity of a nation will be led to a distinctive context. As for the culture outside this orbit, it just would be cheerleader, to not say merely would be an asset.²³ As a result of such a model of cultural studies, the development of cultural studies is not done comprehensively. If there is a cultural pattern that is not following the national feeling situation, then it would become a “reserve player” outside the nation field. Irwan Abdullah, in this regard, wrote.

The concept of “one nation” which was popularized since Soekarno practically has taken place with a repressive strategy, which during the Suharto era was translated through “single principle” politics which emphasized the homogeneity of society. The single principle apart from showing a process of subjugation of the various forces of society to one socio-political principle also shows the state’s conception of power between the state and the people. The people in this regard have been seen as a force that needs to be defeated for the reason of the ideals of national unity and integrity. Differences, as the basis of social power, are not only eliminated but are fought as a mistake.²⁴

The conditions above seem to be a direct result of the arrangement of cultural studies in Nusantara since Indonesia's independence. Therefore, the process of restructuring cultural studies becomes a necessity. Of course, It does not mean repeating the "difference" control patterns practiced by the two regimes above. Differences in cultural features are an undeniable essence in Nusantara. However, the metaphysical aspects that underlie the culture in this country, are not significantly different. Every region in Indonesia has aspects of cosmology, spirit, ethics, knowledge, and beliefs that are not so different from one another.²⁵ It seems that the space for the non-differences can be penetrated and bound back in the frame of the study of Indonesian culture or Nusantaranology.

The Nusantaranology Concept

The term Nusantaranology is not a new scientific framework. It is a study of Nusantara. On November 29, 1998, the author bought the book at a market in Malioboro, Yogyakarta. The book is entitled, Nusantara: A History of Indonesia, by Bernard H. M. Vlekke.²⁶ This book was first published in 1943. It is in very poor condition. The cover has been damaged, and the sheets have been eaten by termites. I left such a condition for years, until then I fixed the cover, but kept the contents as they were. This book is of great interest to the author because it tells about the early history of Indonesia, especially the story of Aceh in the context of the history of Nusantara. But, the story that is presented shows the context of Nusantara from a Dutch colonial perspective. This is the first time the author got to know the term ‘Nusantara’. It is explained that Nusantara extends from the tip of Sumatera Island to Papua, from Mindanao to the island of Rote. An area that is spacious enough, and filled by mountains and seas.

The description of the vastness of Nusantara can also be referred to in the Kakawin Desa Warnnana or Nagara Kertagama when it is explained about the history of Majapahit.²⁷ The large of Nusantara sometimes causes researchers to describe it through comparisons between big countries in the world. It is stated that the term “Nusantara” was first discovered in the inscription of “Mount Wilis” around 1269, during the era of the Singosari Kingdom.²⁸ The term Nusantara is also the meaning of the word Dwipantara, which is contained in the Ramayana book which is interpreted as “islands located between India and China”.²⁹ Some scholars say that Nusantara is a Maritime Continent or Archipelago Continent, where the distance from East to West is 5,110 square kilometers and North to South is 1,888 square kilometers.³⁰ Meanwhile Denys Lombard said that Nusantara was a continuation of Indochina.³¹

Nusantara connects with the outer area surrounded by the ocean. There is Australia to the South. Papua New Guinea to the East. China Sea, where there are several countries to the North and directly facing the South Asian region to the West. You can imagine, what if the concept of Nusantaranology (the science of Nusantara/Archipelago) emerged. So far, regional studies often attach a place name, such as European Studies, American Studies, Chinese Studies, Malay Studies, and so on. There are also studies attached to religion, such as Islamic Studies, Christian Studies, and Jewish Studies. When the author came up with Acehnese Studies, the author had to complete 6 volumes of the book Acehnologi to explain the map of Aceh Studies. This writing project started from 2012 to 2018, just as the sixth volume of Acehnologi was published. Here it appears that when a study emerges, the researcher/writer needs to narrate various philosophical works to explain the scientific concept of Aceh World.³²

When giving the prologue of the book Philosophy of Science, Michael Soerjanto Poespawardojo T. formulated the steps and concepts offered by the Critical Study Circle of Depok Campus, to produce an Indonesian Studies which is a stage of a study carried out by the institution with the aim of “saving the existence and integrity of Indonesia and confirmation of its authority.”³³ The study of rediscovering Indonesia’s identity through the concept of Indonesian Studies also begins with a critical study of culture.³⁴ One of the stages carried out as an intellectual breakthrough is “destroying academic scientific colonization.”³⁵ This is the first thing that should be done in establishing Indonesian Studies through the realization, “decolonization of the restraints of a positivistic way of thinking.”³⁶ The essence of the exploration carried out in the book Philosophy of Science, is a major effort to find Indonesian studies based on what is in Indonesia, through preventing the domination of the influence of the positivistic way of thinking.

Therefore, when presenting the Nusantaranology concept, it should be noted that the object of study is very broad,³⁷ as broad as the Indonesian country. In other words, to build this scientific foundation, at least, it is necessary to explore various aspects that become the scientific spirit in Nusantara. Of course, the explanation of this spirit is not single. It has not mentioned the religious spirit that exists in Nusantara, which originated outside Nusantara, such as Christianity and Islam. The same thing is also concerning the process of naming Nusantara as the Dutch East Indies, where colonial influences will be found in the life of the people in the archipelago.³⁸ The influence of the understanding of foreigners on Nusantara, especially in the colonial and post-independence era, also cannot be ignored. Therefore, formulating the science of Nusantara comprehensively is certainly not easy. Not because of the problem of territorial boundaries, but regarding the explanation of aspects of the scientific foundation that are not single. Various aspects of knowledge must be explored so that the concept of Nusantaranology is reliable.

For this reason, the Nusantaranology formula and its contents will certainly not be balanced, like other scientific concepts that are based on the depth of reasoning. However, the formulation of Nusantaranology is an attempt to explore aspects of knowledge that exist throughout Nusantara. After that, this formula must be filled philosophically and methodologically. When formulating Acehnology, the author tries to explore aspects of knowledge reproduction in Aceh province, that has not been touched by socio-anthropology researchers. Even, the study of the Gayo community seems to provide a very interesting understanding of the power of local knowledge in Nusantara even though this Gayo's culture resides in the province of Aceh. Although this effort was not complete, as a first step, Acehnology has already initiated social and humanities studies in Nusantara. In other words, local knowledge that exists in Nusantara must be contextualized and theorized in such a way, not just described. In this way, it is this form of local knowledge that must be generated when opening studies on Nusantaranology. This is because every region in Indonesia has very dynamic local knowledge.³⁹

The wealth of the treasures above became the main capital in the formation of Nusantaranology. Of course, this effort requires serious study from researchers. In this regard, I am still collecting various pieces of literature on Nusantara studies. The author divides the found treasures into several aspects; first, are cosmological studies. Here the collection process is carried out with the understanding that each region in the archipelago has its roots of cosmological understanding. The second is about the concept of the spirit that drives people's lives in the archipelago. Here we study the belief system, art, meaning, point of view, rituals, and the socio-cultural community in the archipelago. The third is value, which contains ethics, norms, morals, behavior formation, social action, and culture itself. The fourth is an intellectual system that contains knowledge, the basis for contemplation, a system of ideas, philosophy, and paradigms that develop in people's thinking.

The scientific foundation, of course, starts from the spirit, as explained above. Here, it is necessary to explore indigenous religions or beliefs that are attached to the soul of the people, before they encounter teachings from outside Nusantara. For example, in the Batak culture, there is a public view of the Parmalim belief that is a belief in the existence of Debata Mulajadi Nabolon as God Almighty, who "is believed to be the highest power as the creator of the universe."⁴⁰ Likewise, the explanation of Balinese Hinduism, which has its own socio-historical roots and greatly influenced Balinese society, is related to the Balinese cosmological aspect of Mount Agung which cannot be put aside.⁴¹ The same thing also needs to be understood in depth regarding the concept of belief among the Javanese people, which so influences the face of Indonesia today. In Sundanese society, for example, it is stated that when they hear the words Siliwangi and Padjajaran, the Sundanese will feel an inner vibration which then awakens a spirit and pride.⁴² Of course, in understanding Sundanese society, there is a separate cosmological system⁴³ and an understanding of Sundanese Wiwitan must also be included.

Thus, Nusantaranology seeks to revisit the inner vibrations contained in people's lives to be theorized as a new scientific basis. Anthropologists do attempt to understand the "inner vibration" in the object of their research. Nusantara has long been a research field by researchers. The results of the research carried out are preliminary data to formulate how these inner vibrations are theorized. Therefore, this study will reveal how the "inner vibration" would be the spirit in every region in Nusantara.

Conclusion

Based on the facts above, several things need to be underlined. First, this study is only the first step to discover scientific forms that exist in Nusantara. This study has shown that the richness of local treasures which are unique in the field of social and humanities would never be finished to study by researchers. That is, various traditions and local issues in Indonesia show their uniqueness for starting a new study in Indonesia, namely Nusantaranology. Secondly, this study has disclosed how the weaknesses of the social sciences from the West, which seem insignificant in analyzing any research findings. Therefore, it is necessary to have knowledge that comes from the philosophical tradition of science in Indonesia through the study of Nusantaranology or Indonesian Studies. Thirdly, this study can be a starting point to formulate a new research agenda in Indonesia, either by PTKIN (State Islamic higher education) or PTU (non-Islamic Universities), to take maximum attention in mapping how the scientific derivation of Nusantaranology. The author views that when starting the study of Acehnology, it seems that in several regions in the archipelago, they have started regional studies, such as Dayakology, Sundanology, Javanology, and Bantenology. So it can be said that the findings of this scientific concept will strengthen the scientific building of the core of this study; i.e. that aspects of Nusantara studies have a very strong cosmological foothold in this country.
